Is Perjury Being Used To Smear The Ku Klux Klan?

From The Individualist, 307 Piney Forest Road, Danville, Virginia.

Hell Along The Border

In July 1952, Thomas L. Hamilton of Leesville, South Carolina, alleged Imperial Wizard of the Ku Klux Klan, was sentenced in a near-Soviet style trial at Whitville, North Carolina, to four years imprisonment for conspiracy to assault. Keep in mind that no one accused Hamilton of committing a crime. He was only accused of having conspired with others who were alleged, and some of whom admitted having whipped a Negro woman.

Also note that anonymous reports that have come to The Individualist agree the woman said, in court, they did not hurt her very much, but were after her husband who was bedding up with a white woman several miles away. It seems that no newspaper printed any of the testimony, nor the names and identification of the grand jury who indicted Hamilton. Hence, this account can be no more than a mixture of rumors and hearsay.

No. 155 was delayed until it almost missed the mailing deadline, waiting for replies to letters that asked for more detailed information; but nobody is willing to "get mixed up with the FBI." Still a few people grumble when this printer suggests that a lot of people are beginning to think of it as a Federal Bureau of Intimidation. Hitler's GESTAPO grew from a nationwide police force very similar to the FBI; and Hitler was raised to power by unthinking people who believe it does no harm when the police violate the law if they do it to catch crooks. Such doctrine is on all fours with Slack's argument that no man is a criminal if he doesn't get caught.

"But!" The do-gooders howl: "The FBI wouldn't be called in if local sheriffs didn't refuse to do their sworn duty to protect innocent people from mobs!" Ask such do-gooders to cite one instance where an innocent person was whipped by the Ku Klux Klan. Also, please report it to The Individualist.

Newspapers report that Thomas L. Hamilton plead guilty to the charge of conspiracy. Reports also said that Cardinal Mindszenty confessed being guilty of conspiracy against the government, and the sacred Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt said she believed that was true. Do you? And do you believe the Cardinal guilty of anything deserving of death or of bonds? Do you know much more about conditions in Columbus County, North Carolina, than you know about conditions in Hungary? Very few people in the North and West seem inclined to give full faith and credit to the courts of the South. Are they any more trustworthy if some of them connived with Nuderslers in Washington to railroad William Dudley Pelley and Thomas L. Hamilton to the penitentiary?

Now let's recall 1950 when an active and pinkish Dr. Frank Graham failed to be elected as a United States Senator from North Carolina; and the Governor was quoted as saying of Senator Graham: "He is no more a Communist than I am." Rumor whispers that the KKK did all they could to defeat Graham, and caused uneasiness for all other pinks in positions of power. Keep all the foregoing in mind while the printer speculates on what caused Columbus County to get that way.

Stretching all the way from Norfolk, Virginia, to Savannah, Georgia, are thousands of square miles of swamp land, "too thick for beverage, and too thin for food," and much of it impenetrable to any form of life not native to the terrain. The broadest swamps are in North Carolina; and since the legends of man cannot recall, they have been a refuge for the boldest of outlaws. But don't forget: "There is silence deep as death when the bold-est holds his breath for a dime."

Edward Teach, or Thach; better known as Blackbeard, may have been the first outlaw to make a deal with the Governor of North Carolina; and some suspect he wasn't the last. Prohibition, or more accurately, the nullifiers of prohibition, first brought the vices of civilized society to the swamps, and the uncivilized vices were bad enough. But don't get wrong ideas! John Buchan thought the bones of Nathaniel Bacon are somewhere in The Dismal; and this printer has wondered. . . . Anyway, a fair portion of The Spirit of '76 came out of those swamps; and, if it hasn't gone back there to hide, where is it?

Outlawry always flourishes along state lines, and Columbus County, North Carolina, adjoins Horry County, South Carolina, on a line that, in some places, has never been accurately determined, and Judge Lynch holds the only court that is much feared or respected. Here the moral rot of the past forty years shows its seamiest side, and some of it can fairly be called hideous. But keep in mind this printer has not seen it, and can give only second hand reports, and those are fragmentary.

Since hard surface highways have been built across the swamps, city gangsters with uninhibited molls have been brought to consort with the swamp rats, and the combination has produced a quality of hell quite unrefined. It is a sad and perplexing situation for parents of adolescent sons and daughters, if they try to preserve a semblance of decency. Owners of the juke joints make money, and they know how to use it to insure election of a sheriff who will stay fixed. What can decent people do?

In Horry County they tried the Klan; but found that money can corrupt even the Klan, if the Klan is too squeamish to kill traitors who join it with a purpose to poison it from within.

Pantywaists and drugstore cowboys cannot quite catch the idea that the KKK is a lethal weapon, and it is never safe to make sport with the tools of death. Never reach for a gun until you have firmly decided to kill the other fellow, and to do it quicker than he can kill you.

A Klan was organized in Horry County, and there was also a counter-klan. There is no government without force, and where force meets resistance there is war. But to condemn the using of force against criminals is to argue that crime should triumph; and that ruthless might makes right.

It is not easy for an outsider to decide which is a group trying to establish justice, and which is a gang hired to fight for organized vice; but local people can see who is getting a cut of the money.
